The training of character and development of a proper sense of discipline must always play their part in the making of a soldier. Training may seem difficult to the recruit, but he will soon derive pleasure from increased physical and mental fitness. A newcomer to the officer's training School finds himself in the company of men from school, English. The first days are likely to be confused ones, but a cadet soon makes heaps of friends and quickly settles down. The training consists mainly of drill, learning the use of weapon, physical training and simple field craft. After a month of such training the majority of cadets are usually very fit physically. As the training progresses, it becomes more and more interesting and includes the driving and maintenance of motorcars and lorries, the management of animals and fields-tactics. The training is generally carried out in wide open valleys, forests and hills. How enjoyable it is after hours of hard work in the open air, to sit round a camp fire and enjoy a hot meal!

Questions:

1. What does the training of a soldier consist of?
2. Why does the soldier get pleasure after joining the army?
3. Where is the training carried out?
4. How is a soldier made?
5. In what sort of company does the new soldier find himself?
6. What happens as the training progresses?
7. Find out synonym for the word 'strategy' from the passage.

Q.4(B) Read the following story, reshape it and provide a suitable title. (07)

There lived an elephant named Kartik in a jungle. He was robust. Seeing his rocking mountain-like body all the foxes of the jungle thought. "How nice it would be if this elephant dies somehow! We all will have four months' supply of food."

Among the foxes there was an intelligent one named Chatur. He said "You watch how I kill him with the power of my intelligence!" Then seeing the elephant coming, he went to him, prostrated before him and said, "Jai ho to the king".

The elephant was surprised to hear it. He said. 'What Is this? Why hail me so?' The fox said. "O King, all the animals of the jungle have sent me to you. We have sent me to you. We have no king. So considering your strength, we have decided to make you our king. We have made preparations to crown you. Before the muhurta passes away, you follow me and ascend the throne."

Who'd not like to be a king? The elephant wanting to become king followed the fox. The fox led him to a dried up mire. The surface was dry but inside it was wet. The fox walked over the dry surface but the elephant fell into the mire and got trapped in it. He tried hard to come out, but the more he tried, the deeper he went. He asked the fox to help him but he won't hear. The elephant died there of hunger and thirst. All the foxes had a feast of his body for many days.

The intelligent can win over even the strongest.
